When I first started I wanted to draw a disgusting creature but it came out looking like some weird frog thing. Brad then took it too a cool direction but I resorted to what I always draw which is Couples. It was neat to see Brad change his storytelling trying to involve the relationship drama I always love to draw!

I'm not a huge fan of jam comics. Sure, they can be fun to do when you're hanging out at a coffee shop with a couple of friends or whatever, but they always sorta devolve into poop jokes (not that there's necessarily anything wrong with that) and halfhearted drawings once everyone starts to get tired or bored. I mean, it can be a fun exercise to participate in, but the end result is usually a waste of time that births a pretty terrible read.

To be honest, when this book was made, I didn't even have the option of hanging out with any of my artist friends at a coffee shop, or doing drawing exercises, or pursuing any sort of extracurricular activities whatsoever. I was in my last semester of college, buried beneath more homework than I'd ever known, and struggling to take care of my kids while my wife worked full-time. But I still wanted to do something creative; I still wanted to draw comics, despite my busy schedule.

So, I bullied Damon into doing a jam comic with me via email, and we worked on it in our spare moments over the course of a couple months. It made me feel like I still had a productive-foot in the comics world (or a toe, at least), and helped remind me that not all of my previous life had been swallowed up by academia. So, I guess I've softened my stance on jam comics a bit.

But to be honest, I still wish I'd snuck at least one poop joke in there.
